While the returns of this sort of punt can be very attractive, if your chosen team wins but concedes a goal, you will lose your bet.

Let's say England are playing France in the semi-final of the FIFA World Cup.

They do not usually include extra time or penalty shootouts. If you're unsure, reach out to their customer service for clarification. In this scenario, you would also lose if you had predicted a 2-1 win, over 2. If you're not sure which bets are settled at full-time and which extend into extra time or further, then make sure you always read the individual terms and conditions of the bookmaker you're betting with, as these can vary from one bookmaker to another.

The answer to whether extra time betting includes penalties may depend on the specific bookmaker or betting site you are using.

Some bookmakers or betting sites may also offer in-play betting options during the penalty shootout itself, allowing you to place bets on the outcome of each penalty as it is taken.

This typically includes goals scored during the regular match time, as well as any extra time periods.
