On 30th October BBC Watchdog featured an investigation into Checkatrade.com, the Customer Review website, established in 1998 to allow customers to give reviews about tradespeople that they had used.

The Watchdog report focussed on three customers who had experienced problems. On e was a trader not arriving, another was apparently a good plasterer who took on tiling and made an awful job of it and the third managed leave Checkatrade but get back in despite being, by all accounts, a potentially violent fruitcake.

Kevin Byrne, Checkatrade's creator goes into full detail HERE.

Yellow Pages? Google?

These routes would be completely random with little chance of any redress if thi ngs went wrong.

However, some good has come out of the programme as it has made Checkatrade look at systems and beef up checks which can only be a good thing.

But by sowing seeds of doubt, the programme has inadvertently played into the ha nds of rogue traders who will benefit greatly from the public's potentially
